

I am opposed to the use of cell phones aboard moving aircrafts. It seems that on the ground, users seem to think they must talk louder than usual on cells. I can't imagine how loud it will be when their ears are impacted by the altitude and they really shout. I am also bothered already by the lack of etiquette people using cells display. I've heard plenty of raging arguments with supposed love ones on the other end of the phone. I can't imagine my children and I having to fly across the country listening to some of the conversations I've already been privy to in grocery stores, restaurants, etc.

We've already gotten to experience how loud it can get just having them all dial up the minute we touch down. I agree with people already surveyed that it will likely cause arguments among passengers if it's allowed to continue for hours unabated.

I was so serious about not wanting cell phones aboard planes that I was hoping any one of the airlines would continue to ban it and I would fly on that one.
